The echocardiographic (echocardiogram) and electrocardiographic (ECG) are non-invasive investigations that can be used to investigate some of the causes of myocarditis. The echocardiogram is useful in determining the presence of valvular insufficiency, inflammation of the myocardial wall, hypertrophic cardiomyopathy, pericardial effusion and is an essential tool in determining the site of endocardial involvement. ECG is useful in identifying myocardial involvement and is essential in confirming the presence of pericarditis. The electrocardiogram is of most value in evaluating the severity of myocarditis and whether there is ongoing damage. Myocarditis has been recently classified into 3 types: acute myocarditis, chronic myocarditis and cardiac sarcoid. Other causes of myocarditis are infective endocarditis, drug-induced cardiomyopathy, transfusion-associated cardiomyopathy and metabolic (hyperkalaemia, hypoglycaemia, acute tumour lysis syndrome and erythrocyte lysis).
